December 21, 2020 calculates the end of the world, American pastor, predicting the ideal finale for the year to come.

The long-awaited vaccine raises hopes that the beginning of the end of the pandemic will coincide with the end of 2020, one of the most "difficult" years the western world has experienced in its modern history.

American pastor Paul Begley, however, seems to take the opposite view. He does not hope for the end of the pandemic, not even at the end of 2020, like many people.

Begley believes that next Monday, the day the vaccine was approved for Europe, the world will be devastated.

The pastor made this prediction not based on the Mayan calendar, which disappointed us in 2012, but on the fact that Jupiter and Saturn will be very close and in fact, their approach will make them visible from Earth, as a double planet.

Such approaches occur every 20 years, with the previous one being observed in 2000. But they are not all the same. On Monday, the two planets will come closer than ever after 1623 AD, and it will be the first time since 1226 that such a close approach will be visible from Earth.

This important meeting of the two planets will not have a corresponding proximity, until March 15, 2080, when both planets will meet again four-by-four.

After a year of pandemics, earthquakes and other natural and non-natural disasters, the end of the world may not sound so outrageous. The fact that, according to the forecast, it will happen on Monday, increases the chances for many.
